Project Title: Restructuring Web Search Results for Inferring User Search Goals

Search engines use keywords to search from existing pool of database to give search results but different users may have different goals in mind when they search for a query. So, if we analyse the search engine query logs, the search engines will have better understanding of the user search goals. These query logs contain the details of the URL's that users have clicked in a single session which are termed as Feedback Session. These feedback sessions are represented using pseudo documents which consist of titles, snippets etc. These documents can be clustered to infer user search goals and restructuring of these web search results can be done to increase the efficiency of search engines.
