BRIEF DESCRIPTION	In computer forensic analysis, hundreds of thousands of files are usually examined. Much of the data in those files consists of unstructured text, whose analysis by computer examiners is difficult to be performed. In this context, automated methods of analysis are of great interest. We present an approach that applies document clustering algorithms to forensic analysis of computers seized in police investigations. We illustrate the proposed approach by carrying out extensive experimentation with two well-known clustering algorithms (K-means and Cosine Similarity). Related studies in the literature are significantly more limited than our study. Our experiments show that the algorithms provide the best results for our application domain.
